Statement of Daniella Mohazab

I am proud of the young women speaking up now. Not only am I proud but I feel full of support for them and for the Trojan community. We are coming together to fight against injustice. This proves that the Trojan community is strong outside of the classroom, and that we do have the strength and power to change the institutional misconduct.

The changes that have already started in the institution prove USC's capability to change. Now, we must continue to fight for justice. Just because changes are occurring does not mean that it retroactively fixes what happened previously. We have been hurt. Dr. Tyndall has hurt the victims. He has hurt our livelihood, consumed our time and mental health, and he has been the root of distrust and discomfort that we now face.

The last thing I ever imagined was to distrust a part of my own university. Let's work together to transform USC to the greatest university that we have envisioned it to be.

For those who have shared their stories with the public, thank you. I am proud of all of you. For those who have not shared their stories, or their names I understand. Just know that you have a support system here. We are here together fighting for justice.
